

Customer Support FAQ

Q: Why was I charged after I thought I cancelled?

Turning off auto-renew and cancelling are different actions. If auto-renew was turned off, the subscription still runs through the end of the already-paid cycle and no further charge should occur after that date. If a charge occurred after an explicit cancellation, that is a billing error and should be escalated for a refund review, not treated as a policy question.

Q: My discount disappeared and my price went up. Is that a mistake?

Discounts apply for a fixed promotional window and revert to the plan's full list price at expiry; this is expected behavior, not an error. Subscribers can check the account page for the exact expiry date of any active discount before it rolls off, and support can proactively offer a renewed promotion if one is available for that subscriber's segment.

Q: Can I switch to a longer or shorter plan?

Yes. Plan length changes take effect at the next renewal boundary rather than immediately, to avoid a mid-cycle pro-rating dispute. A subscriber wanting an immediate change should be informed of the effective date clearly so they are not surprised by a charge under the old plan terms before the change lands.

Q: The app keeps recommending songs I don't like. Can that be fixed?

Yes - recommendations improve as the subscriber skips or favorites more tracks, and a subscriber can manually reset their taste profile from the account settings if the feed feels persistently off. Support should offer this reset as a concrete action rather than a generic "recommendations improve over time" response, since a high skip rate is a real signal worth acting on immediately rather than waiting out.

Q: I haven't used the app in months but I'm still being charged. What are my options?

The subscriber can cancel at any time from the account page, effective at the end of the current paid cycle. If the subscriber intends to keep the account but simply has not had time to use it, support can mention that a short break in listening does not affect their library, playlists, or account history when they do come back.
